This historic book may have numerous typos, missing text, images, or index. Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. 1887. Not illustrated. Excerpt: ... Reflections in Hatboro Cemetery. Man at most is here but a temporary dweller, a mere sojourner. Notwithstanding fame, riches and human avarice, all worldly possessions have to be left where they were acquired. It has therefore been wisely ordained that as nothing has been brought hither so nothing shall be taken away. Naked, helpless and poor he came and thus will he again be returned into the bosom of his mother earth. Within a few fleeting years he was born and lived and died and was buried; such is human existence and will be the lot of all. Why should we mourn for those whom we will soon have to follow? Retired from business and money making comes at last, even to the unwilling. To think of the magnificent schemes of human ambition that even when successful at last brings their possessor into that common receptacle, a hole in the ground, to moulder away in quietness with those gone before. Knowing therefore the uncertainties of life and the vicissitudes attending the future, it is well to ponder on it and be prepared for what may happen. Among these is the selection and purchase of a final spot to receive him and those that are nearest and dearest when this world's journey is over. The unthinking I know may not give it a thought, but those who have any regard and respect, due to themselves and kindred, surely will, through the demand that must necessarily arise from the increase of population and value of lands. Where shall the dead be buried or how disposed of? will be a much more serious question in the future. Among the several schemes proposed for the burial of the dead, none look to me more favorable than the organized plan of the cemetery associations, where all that can pay their allotted portion have equal rights, independent of any denomina...
