DARCY'S RESOLVE - ONLY ELIZABETH WILL DO JOANN LOUISE

Fitzwilliam Darcy had his friend Charles Bingley to thank when he went into Hertfordshire with him to visit an estate that Bingley was looking to rent. Darcy was looking for an excuse to get away from town for a few days and to have an exhilarating ride during the pleasant days of autumn before it turned colder. The estate they visited was Netherfield and Bingley settled on a lease the next day. Later Darcy joined Bingley and his sisters at Netherfield and soon saw a young woman unlike any other he had ever met, or so he thought. He was surprised that he could be so affected by the daughter of a country gentleman farmer, even though his good friend had told him that one day he would meet a woman who would steal his heart. Darcy never had met such a woman before and he was near twenty-eight years but felt he was safe in Hertfordshire. He knew it was time to find a good woman to marry and he needed a good wife to give him an heir and to be a sister for Georgiana, his younger sister of sixteen years. Surely he would meet such a woman of title and fortune in town, not in Hertfordshire. He laughed silently to himself as if to dismiss the notion that he could lose his heart in the country.

Soon Darcy found himself in trouble. Not only had he acted haughty and above his company at the Meryton Assembly, but he had offended the very young woman who had caught his eye. Darcy had never been in love but could not pull away from Miss Elizabeth Bennet. As much as he knew that she would not be the woman that a man of his station was expected to choose for a wife, an inner voice convinced him that she was exactly the woman he needed. Darcy was in love.

He would need all his resolve to win her heart and to deal with other events that would threaten both of their happiness.
