Trust in Education: Truth and Values (Discourse, Power and Resistance Series)

This book examines the nature and role of trust in contemporary culture where consoling traditional certainties are lost. We need to trust people, institutions, values and truths; but where should we turn to find them? Does trusting make us vulnerable to abuse? More urgently still, is it safe for learners?the children, young people and adults in the world of contemporary education?to trust their teachers to care, and to tell the truth? And can teachers trust their managers and institutional practices?

This is the eighth volume in the Discourse, Power, Resistance series. It has established a reputation for radical critique of the values and practices of contemporary education, and for the steady affirmation of what is best and most significant in emerging educational discourse. The writers in this volume are drawn from eight different countries. They present a penetrating critical analysis of the breakdown of trust in education and beyond, coupled with a down-to-earth account of the way ahead if that trust is to be recovered.
